FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 1, 1859. DEFAMATION.

It is commonly said that law is the security law or common precedent, practice, or any other formal and legal proceeding, then is law far from being the ægis that it is claimed to be. The law of social justice, the golden rule that we are to do to others only what $1,50. we should be satisfied to receive from them, is the only assurance of justice, of benevolence, or of common courtesy. The canons of civilized intercourse demand this, and the sanctions of religion enforce the obligation .-We can imagine no worse pests to society than those social Shylocks who are always ready to do any evil to which no legal consequences are attached, and even to gratify their malice in defiance of law, when the penalties are indefinite or capable of being

Sheer malice is not, however, so common or so mischievous as the careless abetting of evil, the persecution or injury without malicious intent, or, indeed, any object except the heedless joining in common defamation .-Trace slanders to their origin and it is not difficult, usually, to detect their motive .-There may be palliating circumstances at-tending the first utterance. Imagined or real injury, anger, or other infirmity may tip the arrow with venom, but there is not even this excuse for uninterested parties who furnish feathers for the darts, and speed them on their errand of mischief. It would be ridiculous, if it were not painful, to notice how the mere love of talk and the fondness for gossip make half a community the emissaries of one social faction, while the other half are as firmly bound to the other.

It is said that every citizen owes a debt to the community in which he lives, for the position he holds in it. We submit that the obligation is mutual. No man who has pursued the even tenor of his way till he has reached a point where he is an object of envy to his less successful contemporaries, and of example to his juniors, can have done good for himself without benefiting the circle in which he moves. He has established his character .-It is not unfrequently the case that he has lived down slander and overcome enmity.-To say that there are no scars of these con- Morphy, 25c. flicts, would be to pronounce him invulnerable; and that, we fancy, can be said of few .-But when long years have handed the early events of a life to oblivion, to rake open the wounds of the past, and to parade things before the public which, if true, have been cancelled by amendment, and, if false, cannot, after so long an interval, be disproved, is most unmanly and unjust. Whenever a disparaging report gains circulation, it inevitably reaches quarters where the vindication can never follow. The stain of detraction, to a certain extent, is ineffaceable. Hence, we should hesitate even to circulate a true charge against a neighbor; for, as is well remarked by Dr. Moore, in that old time novel Zeleuco, "a malicious falsehood ceases to do harm when the truth comes to be known; but the mischief attending a malicious truth is much more durable."

Ordinarily there is little truth in malicious reminiscences; often none whatever. And always, whatever be the actual intrinsic character of a revived rumor or charge, it takes its present hue from the motive and intention of the parties who reproduce it. We have more than once witnessed injustice and persecution of this sort, and our first, and generally correct, impression is, to stamp as false whatever anger, emnity or opposition may allege from the forgotten past. It is not what any man was, but what he is, with which we have to do. And he who can be assailed only by reviving the alleged sins of his youth, must in his heart despise, as he may defy, his calumniators.

Common defamation is what the written law cannot prevent any more than it can establish common fame. The conservative and honorable principles of social intercourse are | highly finished, and durable piano, call at the only protection which a citizen really has for the honor and respect which are dearer to a sensitive man than his wealth or, we had almost said, his life. We should say, without reserve, that honor is dearer than life, were it not that we keep in mind the difference between character and reputation. One is intrinsic, the other is external. One is what is, the other what people think or say of it. He who knows the falsehood of an evil consciousness, and though he would sacrifice much to make his external position good, will never despair, though he do not succeed. A friend of Socrates wept that he was to be executed in innocence of the charges brought against him. "Would it console you or me if I were guilty?" asked the sage.

Every community and every man in it owes to truth and decency, to candor and honesty, the discouragement of slander and defamation. Printed or spoken, it is a monstrous evil; and it lies at the root of all unhappiness and injustice. It impedes all pleasant intercourse, and is a most dangerous instrument in controversy, whether legal or other. It is more likely to plague the inventor than to produce the effect for which it is intended .-The tongue cuts like a sword, and they who play it in malice, may perish with their own weapon.—Philadelphia Gazette.
